There is an invisible army of people deep inside the world’s biggest and best-known companies, pushing for safer and more responsible practices, striving to prevent the next Rana Plaza factory collapse and the next Deepwater Horizon explosion. Unfortunately, they don’t always succeed.

Christine Bader was one of those people. She loved BP and then-CEO John Browne’s progressive rhetoric on climate change and human rights—until a string of BP accidents, Browne’s resignation under a cloud of scandal, and the start of Tony Hayward’s tenure as chief executive, which would end with the Deepwater Horizon disaster. Bader’s story of working in multinational business is unique in its details, but not in its themes: of feeling like an outsider both inside the company and out; of getting mixed messages from senior management; of being frustrated with corporate life but committed to pushing for change from within.

Join us for a thought-provoking conversation about corporate responsibility...

www.ethics.emory.edu