2012 Boozer - Noether Internships in Social Ethics and Community Service

Now Accepting Applications

The Jack Boozer Fund and the Hermann and Janet Noether Funds are now accepting applications for summer and fall 2012. Monies from these funds are designed to allow Emory University students to undertake internships and service-learning programs in social ethics and community service. See attachments for full details.

The Jack Boozer and Hermann and Janet Noether Funds enable Emory University undergraduate, graduate, and professional students to pursue internships that combine study and an active working engagement with situations and problems that require a deepened understanding and practice of social ethics and community service.

The Jack Boozer funds support students undertaking service in the United States, with an emphasis on the Atlanta area. The Noether funds support students who wish to undertake service-learning projects internationally. While students working in Israel or Taiwan will be given precedence, applications are invited for projects in any locale.

In their applications students are expected to present to the Committee a program of learning and active involvement in a situation that requires serious reflection upon, and application of, the principles of social ethics and community service.

Priority will be given to community-based, grass-roots, hands-on, activist projects. The Funds do not favor support of research. The maximum award for the Boozer interns shall be $2000. The Noether award maximum shall be $3000.

Application Procedure
Students should submit a completed application and a statement of interest letter to the Boozer-Noether Funds Committee, c/o Edward Queen, Center for Ethics, 1531 Dickey Drive or via e-mail to equeen@emory.edu. The letter should outline the proposed project as fully as possible. The deadline for summer funding is April 22. Recipients will be notified soon after the deadline.
